Mrs. Baskerville Bridgeforth, of 1824
West Franklin Street, gave a very delightful informal tea at 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon in honor of her mother, Mrs. John R. Cooke. The parlors were decorated entirely in pink flowers, a sliver vase of pink lilies ornamenting the toa table. Assisting Mrs. Bridgeforth in receiving the guests were Mrs. Cooke, Mrs. Fairtle Cooke, Mrs. Stuart Cooke. A number of friends called and the affair was a very delightful one.

Almost overybody is familiar with the story of Mme. Du Barry. Those who have not read it in history have seen it wonderfully portrayed on he stage by Mrs. Carter.

We all know how Du Barry ruled the court, and how high church dignitaries were compelled to bow to her und do her honor. She was the mistress of the King, and her position was n reality more authoritative and powerful for the time being than that if a Jucen.

abounds with the names of these women who ruled the Kings, and through the Kings the people.

Ladies of title and culture and respectability who desired any state or social favors for their sons were obliged to seek the induence of the Kings mistresses first.

Respect and honor were shown these women when they appeared in public. No one dared slight or neglect them. The church accepted them as factors in royal lives.

Recently a King died. During his life King Leopold of Belgium had lived populy with a woman who was the mother of his child. But he had been obliged to accept a very different attitude from his subjects than that which the Kings of earlier times demanded. There was open disapproval, open disrespect, shown the King and the affinity.

The People Became Incensed.

The people did not hesitate to express themselves regarding the situation.
